Man

Man is composed of two parts in one body. Feelings and the thought perceptions forming the mind. The former are feminine, while the latter are masculine in nature.

The feelings result from sensory contact with the environment. They are electro-chemical impulses generated by the sense organs, forming that which motivates and animates the body and informs the mind. The body is a power source, if you will. It has quantity and quality. Of these sensory contacts affects both the nature of feelings and the perception ability of the sense organs. For example, in the former, the pain of burning (the feeling), while in the latter, the resulting physiological impact onto the sense organs as it is affected by its contact with the flames of fire.

The mind, the second part of the body, records the physiological change to the sense organs and the feelings generated by its contact with nature in the becoming sensation. It is recorded as pain and the judgemental part of the mind acquires an appropriate response directing it in future contacts with fire.

Among the capabilities of the mind is its ability to be mindful of its senses, both feelings and the actual physiological effects to the sense of their contact with their environment.

The senses have the complementary responsibility of serving the mind faithfully in the information they transmit to it. This is the nature of the link. Their harmonious functioning is vital to the health, happiness, and peace of man.

The thought perceptions of the mind are thus initiated. by the feelings through sensory contact with the environment. Then thoughts, perceptions, and subsequent judgements, once initiated from the mood of the mind, develop over time. Our minds are always according to our individual experience of sensory contact with our environment. Once developed they direct our bodies in its action on our environment and work with our feelings in increasing our knowledge and experience of our world. Our minds effectively become the governor of our being at the individual level. One can see the importance of the development of a sound mindset. One that is truly in harmony with the elements making up our world. This includes the basic physiological world of matter and the social worlds with its laws etc, we create.

At its basic level, our mindset is limited by the strength of our sense organs to endure contact with our environment. Thoughts and judgements beyond that are speculative in nature and carry a risk of error. This can be dangerous when acted upon. Today, through technology, man has sought to address the risk and the possible abater by trying to enhance senses ability to penetrate the nature of our environment. This has yielded new and deeper insights necessitating improved judgements. This also has helped to create a much more sophisticated world. It has also given birth to a need for a more sophisticated mind set in order for one to properly function within it. The problem is the vast majority of people do not possess such a mindset largely due to the fact that they were not directly apart of the technological processes responsible for this sophisticated world. Which means it was not their experience. They are therefore distant from it, and yet they find themselves having it forced upon them. They are merely feeling the effects of it, and are generally out of touch with the cause and therefore the reason for it. Their response to it may be from the extremes of accepting it and rejecting it. This is the basis of alienation and resistance. Those actively involved in its cause, the small minority, have found its government and preservers and are expected from the majority by it. It is as if it has taken on an existence of its own, ordering and shaping society according to itself. In the process becoming out of touch with the Counterpart, the common man with his incident still linked to sensory related feeling perceptions. The latter has suffered because of their position at the hands of this technologically created humankind that is distant from them and by its nature ignores them. It also suffers their more independent experiencing of reality outside of this technological one, which is really artificial, being based on mechanical sensors rather than the natural senses.

At the micro level the above can be explained in the following way. Man, the mind, is out of touch with himself—feelings. The woman, his second self. Conversely, woman the feelings, is out of touch with herself. Third, the man, his second self. The whole education devolves into a state of confusion destroying health, happiness and peace. The result of mankind's attempt to make it in rotation of the guidance of God.

The key to rectifying the problem is the strengthening of the senses organs, but not by artificial means. That man seeks to enhance his senses with technology shows a limitation on his part. God intends to enhance the senses by giving man a completely new and more powerful body. Here the mind and feeling are woefully linked further. The sense organs are able to endure
Contact with all its elements of its environment without causing damage, and further accessing the secrets of creation will be derived through means more sure than the senses. There is therefore the need for man to build up with this means (Chosen spirit).

Our present artificialized thinking—thought perceptions—must be replaced by God's thinking—thought perceptions. This is the link. God cannot give man to possess just a body while he is yet in his current thinking. He would merely use it in his destructive course of remaking his environment according to his present artificial thinking. Further God cannot override this thinking by giving the mind and his spirit (synonymous with our feelings) without our permission. The thinking of God, based on his spirit, is recorded in the Scriptures. Meditations and steadfastness in God's thinking develop God's spirit—electromagnetic, rather than electro-chemical impulses—in man. This is the new power source to animate the new body God intends to create. With it a new heaven and new earth. This spirit and mind will be separated out and placed in separate bodies—male and female—while at the same time being one. Both intimately linked, complementing each other by telepathy. They will be united to each other in an eternally inseparable relationship. This is the meaning of true marriage according to the divine plan. This process is presently in operation. Mt. Carmel was an experiment testing its practicability for this generation. The above is written out of the mind and spirit of God and is harmonious with the written Word of God. This is possible because of my being cooperative of being in this reality. My body to be is already in use, the illumination of my mind. Our bodies are yet to follow.
